SAFETY PAYS

"Al" Bellour, meteorological aide in the U.S. Weather Bureau Station at the Laboratory, had an experience recently that demonstrated to him that safety rules are necessary.

"Al" was temporarily assigned to duty with the Meteorological Group and was asked to perform an emergency job on the weather tower. "Al" said that he did not have his safety shoes but that he would be glad to do the work. The supervisor in charge of the operation insisted, however, that "Al" obtain safety shoes before going to the tower.

"Al" obtained his safety shoes, and while working on the tower, an electric drill was dislodged and fell on the toe of his shoe. If he had not been wearing the safety shoes it is probable that he would have suffered injuries to his foot.

An ounce of prevention is still worth a pound of cure.
